Holocaust Deniers on the Internet: Moderating Strategies

by
James C. Mott
University of Illinois, Chicago

Anyone who moderates an Internet list on the Holocaust must inevitably decide about whether to allow Holocaust deniers to subscribe to the list or participate in discussions. Unfortunately, there is no one formula that pleases everyone. If deniers are not allowed to post messages, the moderator will be accused of censorship, political incorrectness and denying freedom of speech.. However, if they are allowed to post, there is the risk of alienating those for whom debating the reality of the Holocaust would be akin to arguing whether there was slavery in the United States, if there was a French Revolution, or if the earth is round. In this essay, I will examine the policies of some of the more prominent Internet lists regarding Holocaust deniers, with specific emphasis on HOLOCAUS[1] (The History of the Holocaust), which I moderate. My focus is almost exclusively on electronic mail lists rather that on the World Wide Web.

A survey of Holocaust related lists reveals at least three different policies regarding Holocaust deniers. On one extreme are Usenet lists such as ALT.REVISIONISM[2] and ALT.SKINHEADS, which allow deniers to post messages freely without restriction. Nearly every university and college has Usenet connections available to faculty and students for free, although there is no way to determine who reads these lists, as subscriptions are not required. On Usenet lists like these, deniers are free to question the reality of the Holocaust with anyone who cares to engage them in discussion. Representatives from the Institute for Historical Review (IHR) and Committee on Open Debate on the Holocaust (CODOH), two of the most significant denier organizations, maintain a high profile on these forums.

Except for these Usenet lists, deniers have made few inroads into Holocaust-related lists on the Internet. Nearly all of the other lists are moderated and almost no list editor will post their materials except to give their subscribers the opportunity to examine and refute them. The best example is HLIST[3], edited by Ken McVay, which has republished articles from various sources including Spotlight, an antisemetic, anti-

[1]The e-mail address for HOLOCAUS is holocaus@uicvm.uic.edu.
[2]Those who cannot access UseNet can subscribe to REVISIONISM at listproc@shamash.nysernet.org.
[3]The e-mail address for HLIST is hlist@almanacb.bc.ca.

Zionist tabloid that regularly prints articles on Holocaust denial. Discussions of these articles on the list are summarized into FAQs (Facts and Questions) and stored on a publicly accessible server for future reference by those wishing to refute deniers. In January 1993, Spotlight published an article that led directly to an Auschwitz FAQ, which later led directly to the Leuchter FAQ. The same format was also used to assemble Operation Reinhard-related material into another FAQ. All of these FAQs were the direct result of publishing the Spotlight article on HLIST and the ensuing discussions on an effective response.[4]

In early 1993, McVay moved HLIST to H-Net, where it became HOLOCAUS. Through HOLOCAUS he republished a revisionist article by Walter Luftl, an Austrian Engineer, which previously appeared in The Journal of Historical Review in the winter of 1992-93.[5] According to this article, mass murder at the wartime camps of Auschwitz and Mauthausen with Zyklon B gas and carbon monoxide was impossible technically and because it was not compatible with the laws of nature. These findings reconfirmed the conclusions reached by Fred Leuchter in The Leuchter Report: The End of a Myth: An Engineering Report on the Alleged Execution Gas Chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau, and Majdanek, Poland.[6] Leuchter maintains that there is no evidence that homicidal gassings took place at any of these sites. Furthermore, given the size and usage rates of gas chambers at Auschwitz and Majdanek, it would have required 68 years to execute 6 million people (as if anyone has ever claimed that all 6 million were killed at Auschwitz and Majdanek).[7] McVay's purpose for posting the Luftl article was to add new information to the Leuchter FAQ, especially about the chemical analysis of their response to Pressac, et al.[8], who maintains that there is documentary and material evidence that homicidal gas chambers were not a hoax.

---

[4]Message by Ken McVay to HOLOCAUS, April 7, 1993.
[5]Walter Luftl "The Luftl Report: An Austrian Engineer's Report on the 'Gas Chambers' of Auschwitz and Mauthausen" in The Journal of Historical Review, Vol. 12, Number 4 (Winter 1992-93).
[6]Fred Leuchter The Leuchter Report: The End of a Myth: An Engineering Report on the Alleged Execution Gas Chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau, and Majdanek, Poland (U.S.A., 1988) with forward by Robert Faurisson.
[7]Fred Leuchter "Inside the Auschwitz 'Gas Chambers'," The Journal of Historical Review, Summer, 1989.
[8]Pressac's Auschwitz: Technique and Operation of the Gas Chambers uses corporate and government documents, German architectural drawings and plans for the crematoria, and modern studies of the former gas chambers to refute the claims of deniers. Pressac himself has been associated with deniers. It was when he sought to prove that the Holocaust never happened that he discovered quite the opposite.

McVay's decision to publish this article conflicted with H-Net policy, which is not to publish or republish denier material, and led to his decision to resign as moderator. Shortly thereafter, the executive director of H-Net sent a memo to subscribers to clarify the limits of the list.[9] The goal of the list is to sharpen sensibilities about right and wrong, and to approach the Holocaust in a sensitive manner consistent with policies of the state of Illinois, which owns and finances the list. Whereas there was no disagreement about McVay's intent to discredit the revisionists, he stated that in the future, HOLOCAUS would not publish or republish anything by this group. In response to those who may see these limits as censorship, the policies of HOLOCAUS are those of any professional journal. There are specific requirements of what will be published and the opinions of many inside and outside reviewers are considered carefully to maintain a forum for only the most serious scholarship. Whereas HOLOCAUS will help subscribers who want to refute revisionism, it does not focus on revisionism, but on other topics on the Holocaust deserving of more attention.

There is no doubt that there are many people who would prefer a list such as McVay's with which they can openly address the issues raised by Holocaust deniers; two subscribers responded strongly in support of McVay on the need to confront revisionism with the truth and against excluding denier materials from the list. One subscriber charged that it is inconsistent for the University of Illinois to protest the Luftl posting and at the same time not exclude books from its libraries such as Mein Kampf, Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and The International Jew, which depict the character and behavior of Jews as evil.[10] Another subscriber accused the list of "political correctness" and "sanitizing the truth for public consumption."[11] Everyone else remained quiet, although that should not be reason to draw conclusions about support or dissent.

Central to HOLOCAUS policy regarding deniers as "revisionists" is excluding them from the list altogether. All historians are "revisionists" in a sense; in our research and teaching we all review evidence by taking a second look at the accepted facts and theories and determine our own conclusions. There is no such thing as purely objective history. However, in the case of deniers, conclusions are based on distortions

---

[9]Message to HOLOCAUS by Richard Jensen, April 11, 1993.
[10]Message to HOLOCAUS by Marc Mayerson, April 8, 1993.
[11]Message to HOLOCAUS by James Ginther, April 8, 1993.

of reality and utter disregard for the facts, and to accept them as "revisionists" would wrongfully concede that they are legitimate historians and give credibility to their position as "the other side." The issue of "revisionism" was perhaps put most effectively by Cynthia Ozick in Berel Lang's Writing and the Holocaust.

> We think of the imagination as a making force, as that which puts something in place of nothing. The "revisionists" employ imagination to put nothing in place of something. Who would have dreamed that a new sort of inventive cleverness would arise with the power to undo history? Who would have dreamed that somebody would come and say it never happened? The Swiftian fancifulness of it -- that those who delight in its having happened are the very ones who say it never happened![12]

Numerous scholars on HOLOCAUS have echoed Ozick's words about the incorrect use of the term "revisionism" with relation to the Holocaust. In a posting entitled "Holocaust Revisionism," one subscriber received some gentle correction from several others after he innocently used the term "revisionists" to refer to Holocaust deniers. A subscriber from Indiana State University wrote that "Deborah Lipstadt helped me to see the importance of not using the term "revisionist" for them [deniers], although I still on occasion will tack 'so-called' in front of it in order to inform people what I am talking about."[13] Another subscriber from Princeton University stated that although "historical revisionism is a legitimate activity and refers to rethinking about the past, it was not meant to cover the idea of denying factual information" which is what Holocaust deniers do. For that reason, when referring to deniers we should all resist using the words "revisionists" or "revisionism" and instead substitute "deniers" or "denial".[14]

Most true historians will not debate deniers about whether there was a Holocaust because it is already an accepted fact. To do so, or for that matter even to give their works scholarly credence, would distort the purpose of the list, which is to provide a forum for legitimate scholars of the Holocaust to discuss their research and teaching, and not have to waste their time with persons who portray themselves as scholars but do not use even basic historiographic methods and have no scholarly purpose. In one recent posting "On Debating With Holocaust Deniers," a subscriber from a midwest university said he refused several opportunities to debate deniers because "to do so would reduce an historical catastrophe to a 'matter of opinion.'"[15] Somewhat more charitable was an Oxford University subscriber who was willing to give

---

[12]Cynthia Ozick Writing and the Holocaust, edited by Berel Lang (Holmes & Meier, 1988), p. 281.
[13]Message to HOLOCAUS by Richard Pierard, June 22, 1994.
[14]Message to HOLOCAUS by Froma Zeitlin, Princeton University, June 17, 1994.
[15]Message to HOLOCAUS by Mark Ira Kaufman, August 13, 1994.

deniers credit for stimulating worthwhile debate over free speech and censorship, and for keeping the issue before the public, which has expressed that the time to forget has come. In addition, they force true Holocaust scholars to tighten their standards of scholarship and education and to purge the field of myths and exaggerations that have grown out of the Holocaust. However, his response to whether scholars should debate them was an unequivocal no, "for the same reason that NASA doesn't send scientists to debate the UFOlogists or people who think the moon landings were a hoax: because it is a waste of good people's time. " As to whether they should be prevented from speaking, again he answered, no because "trying to shut them up will fail, first of all; and second, will let them pose as martyrs and victims of censorship. This will generate sympathy for them in some quarters."[16]

One of the lone dissenters is Ken McVay, the moderator of HLIST. Although McVay considers debating deniers on any ground a complete waste of time, he makes an exception on the Internet in through which "exposure is massive" and "not debating them lends them the very credibility you would deny them." In his opinion, "Jewish groups who refuse to address Holocaust denial for fear that lending legitimacy to the deniers need to rethink their positions with regard to the Internet." According to McVay, "shining the bright light of reality upon them" has forced some major deniers to back down in defeat, including "Greg Raven, Bradley R. Smith, Friedrich Berg, and Ross Vicksell (CODOH) who have yielded the field and fled to the Web where they can offer their wares without those annoying 'Jewish pests' making life difficult for them."[17]

When I became editor of HOLOCAUS in April 1993, I anticipated that much of my work would involve excluding posts from Holocaust deniers. Given the volume of denial postings on unmoderated lists such as ALT.REVISIONISM or ALT.SKINHEADS, it was my assumption that I should be prepared for an onslaught of submissions from deniers, which I intended to junk quietly. To my surprise, this has not been a problem. In part, this may be attributed to the careful screening of potential subscribers who apply to the list. Everyone is expected to fill out an application stating their academic credentials and their reasons for subscribing.[18] My goals are to limit membership to Holocaust scholars as much as possible and to prevent deniers from subscribing. To date, of 400 applicants, only 8 persons indicated interest on the subject of Holocaust denial, and only one could clearly be identified as a denier. That person was Arthur Butz, author of The Hoax of the Twentieth Century[19] and other related publications in the Journal of Historical Review. Six of the applicants were interested in how to address the problem of Holocaust denial, and one asked to be added to the list "unless this is a list of twisted Holocaust deniers."[20] Butz also applied for membership to H-ANTIS[21] (History of Antisemitism), another H-Net list that is closely associated with HOLOCAUS.

---

[16]Message to HOLOCAUS by Steven Paulsson, August 22, 1994.
[17]Messages to H-ANTIS by Ken McVay on March 7, 1995 and December 9, 1995; An example of a Web site McVay refers to is run by Greg Raven of the Institute for Historical Review at the address: http://www.kaiwan.com/~greg.ihr. Another WWW site that has been set up specifically to counter the IHR Web server is //http://www.kzoo.edu/~k044477/RUE1-HomePage.html.

In her book Denying the Holocaust,[22] Deborah Lipstadt devotes an entire chapter to Arthur Butz entitled "Entering the Mainstream." She chose that particular title, because unlike most other deniers who are largely neo-Nazis or extremists with no academic standing, Butz is a tenured professor at Northwestern University's School of Engineering since 1974. He is not an historian. Unlike most other denial publications, the format of Butz's works are clearly academic in structure, complete with footnotes, quotations from other historians, and references to actual archival and research centers. However, once one gets beyond the academic structure, it is clear that Butz shows as much disregard for the facts as any other denier, exhorting that the story of the extermination of the Jews during World War II is a propaganda hoax, and dismissing arguments to the contrary as "absurd," "garbage" and "tall tales."[23]

Rejecting Butz outright for membership to HOLOCAUS could have been misinterpreted as censorship, a charge any scholarly list cannot take lightly. Historically, deniers have found defenders even in intellectual communities based on arguments of free speech and free inquiry no matter how repugnant their message. However, it would be inconceivable to think that a private list cannot reject subscribers if the quality of their scholarship is called into serious question.[24] From the beginning, it was my opinion that

---

[18]See Appendix A for a copy of the HOLOCAUS application.
[19]Arthur Butz The Hoax of the Twentieth Century , 2nd Edition (Historical Review Press, 1977).
[20]Application from Max Gershenoff, October 10, 1994.
[21]The e-mail address of H-ANTIS is h-antis@uicvm.uic.edu.
[22]Deborah Lipstadt Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (Plume, 1994).
[23]Arthur Butz, op. cit.
[24]The November 23, 1994 issue of Chronicles of Higher Education contains an article by Thomas J. DeLoughry called "Gatekeeping on the Internet" which addresses the issues of maintaining "closed lists". The author is primarily concerned with attempts to limit who can read materials posted on the net. He is convinced that restricting access to what is posted will probably fail legal tests. However, he gives only Butz should be denied membership to the list, because his "revisionism" represented no scholarship. Rather than making the decision arbitrarily on my own, I consulted subscribers by posting the question to the list.[25] A similar survey was run on H-ANTIS.

As expected, the results of both surveys were strongly against Butz. On HOLOCAUS, 39 responses opposed his admission, 6 favored it and 2 were ambivalent, and 3 or 4 subscribers threatened to resign from the list if Butz was permitted access. The results from the survey on H-ANTIS were about the same, with 25 against, 6 in favor and 2 ambivalent. Most that favored admitting Butz did so because they opposed censorship. A subscriber from Pacific Lutheran University stated that he was "reticent to pre-censor who may belong to any e-mail list on the basis of their known beliefs."[26] Another subscriber from Dickinson State University wrote that we should have confidence that we can deal with Butz or anyone else and should not "allow censorship to be our tool to dealing with individuals whose positions we find to be repugnant." [27] One subscriber even held out hope that Butz may change his mind, citing Jean-Claude Pressac as an example.[28] Pressac originally questioned whether there was sufficient material or documentary evidence of gas chambers but latter changed his mind after a thorough examination of documentation at Auschwitz and in former Soviet archives.

Few if any of those who opposed the admission of Butz, indicated a conflict between refusing him membership and freedom of speech. Whereas no one argued in favor of muzzling deniers, few believed that free speech extended to providing someone with a platform to deliver their message. Doing so would subvert the purpose of the list. A subscriber from University of South Alabama stated that "Quality will suffer if you take this wonderful list and turn it into a debating forum in which deniers are given air time."[29] A subscriber from Australia warned that "it would not be long before this list would get filled up with huge amounts of junk like they do periodically on other lists, making any kind of academic debate impossible."

---

cursory attention to the discussion of rights to regulate postings and on whether lists can restrict their memberships.

[25]The text of the message sent to the list read that "Arthur Butz, author of the Hoax of the Twentieth Century wants to subscribe to HOLOCAUS. I'm opposed to it. As I see it, debating Holocaust deniers is not part of the mission of the HOLOCAUS list. What do other subscribers think?".

[26]Message to HOLOCAUS by Larry Nelson, September 9, 1994.

[27]Message to HOLOCAUS by David A. Meier, September 9, 1994.

[28]Message to H-ANTIS by Charles Gregory Fried, September 9, 1994.

[29]Message to HOLOCAUS by Dan Rogers, September 11, 1994.

Holocaust denial is not a legitimate alternative viewpoint; no amount of evidence or discussion that anyone can present will change the deniers' minds. To permit them to post to HOLOCAUS simply in the name of free speech would the same as allowing flat earth advocates to post to ALT.ASTRONOMY with huge amounts of discredited "evidence" that the earth is flat.[30]

Most subscribers join HOLOCAUS because it provides them with an easy and convenient forum for communicating their research and teaching interests with other scholars worldwide without all the clutter found on Usenet discussion lists, and without having to sift through inane verbiage. For this reason alone, it is extremely important that the scholarly integrity of the list be maintained. As one subscriber put it, "this is a moderated H- group. I subscribe to it for the intellectual quality contributed by the subscribers. Arthur Butz has shown in other forums that he has nothing of substance to contribute."[31] Echoing his sentiments was a subscriber from Penn State University who wrote "This is a scholarly group and I can't see Butz as being a scholar in any objective or critical sense."[32] A subscriber from Austin Peay State University opined that, "my first inclination is to allow him to join, but the network members are engaged in serious, scholarly exchanges. We do not need to invite clutter. If we can legally deny his request, I suggest we do so."[33] A subscriber from the University of Illinois, Chicago feared that Butz's admission could subvert the true intention of the list which attracted him in the first place which is to "examine the nature, history, and contemporary enactments of anti-semitism, and the nature, history, and contemporary efforts opposing it. To lay open for debate the givens upon which this net was launched will necessarily tatter the discussions which the subscribers expected when they signed on."[34]

Subscribers are also concerned about whether deniers might exploit the discussions on the list if they knew their identities and electronic mail addresses, given their outrageous track record of misquoting and distorting the statements of serious scholars. Although it would be nearly impossible to prevent deniers from reading the list (they could subscribe under an alias or read messages sent to another subscriber), most subscribers prefer that it should not be made any easier on them by allowing them to subscribe under their

---

[30]Message to HOLOCAUS by Steven King, September 11, 1994.
[31]Message to HOLOCAUS by Herb Effron, September 9, 1994.
[32]Message to H-ANTIS by Paul Lawrence Rose, September 9, 1994.
[33]Message to HOLOCAUS by Dewey A. Browder, September 9, 1994.
[34]Message to H-ANTIS by Victor Harnack, September 9, 1994.

own names. According to one HOLOCAUS subscriber, letting Butz subscribe would be like "introducing a virus into the system and potentially spoiling the free and candid discussions we conduct."[35] An H-ANTIS subscriber was even more graphic in his description of what potential damage someone like Butz could cause to the list. In his estimation, "Even those who do not fear retribution or recrimination will think twice before speaking since they will know that their rhetorical attempts will be scrutinized by someone who begins with different assumptions."[36]

These concerns became all too real in August 1995, when Greg Raven from the Institute of Historical Review and associate editor of their journal on Holocaust denial became a HOLOCAUS subscriber. I have no explanation at to how he was able to subscribe other than that it was an obvious oversight on my part as moderator. All subscriptions must be approved by the me and somehow I accidentally let his through. Raven is responsible for claiming that Hitler was "about the best thing that could have happened to Germany," and characterizing Hitler as "a great man ... possibly one of the greatest leaders of our century." He also wrote "no serious historian now supports the once supposedly proven story of 'extermination camps' in the territory of the old German Reich."[37]

Raven began by submitting messages to the list which were never posted because of their content. Becoming frustrated, he obtained a copy of the subscriber list (then available to any HOLOCAUS subscriber), and mailed each subscriber denial literature, hoping to engage them in debate. Numerous subscribers sent protests to Greg Raven and to the postmaster at his site; eventually he stopped sending messages to HOLOCAUS subscribers. Judging from his personal response to my protest, he was not a bit repentant; he accused me of not reading the material, which he claimed did not deny the Holocaust. In addition, he stated that the attitudes of the so-called "scholars" on the list are highly inappropriate when the conversation turns to the Holocaust. "Is your knowledge and understanding so poor that you cannot discuss views that are variant to yours? Are you studying a historical event or engaging in some kind of secular

---

[35]Message to HOLOCAUS by Froma Zeitlin, September 9, 1994.
[36]Message to H-ANTIS by Victor Harnack, September 9, 1994.
[37]Nizkor Project (http:///www.almanac.bc.ca). A more complete biography on Greg Raven is available on http://www.almanac.bc.ca/rue/RUE2-RavenGeneralInfo.html.

religion where faith in the unbelievable is paramount?" He ended his note by saying that none of the "Holocaust scholars" had bothered to refute any of the points raised in the two messages he sent them.[38]

The hurt he caused cannot be adequately described. As one subscriber from University of Science and Arts of Oklahoma put it:

> Greg Raven has just sent some very offensive Holocaust denial materials (2 batches!) to the members of the HOLOCAUS(t) list, one member at a time. The header was about 22 pages long. I suspect this is technically not considered spamming since he is sending the material to individuals rather than lists. On the other hand, I can imagine few more vicious and heinous acts of mental cruelty than sending this kind of material to hundred of people who may themselves be victims or the children of victims.[39]

If for no other reason than this, HOLOCAUS is morally justified for denying Butz and Raven and other deniers access to the list. This we owe to the victims and survivors of the Holocaust who increasingly feel forced to speak out about their experiences to counter the lies and distortions of the so-called deniers or pseudorevisionists. There is speculation that the reason Primo Levi committed suicide was that despite years of trying to educate the world about his experience at Auschwitz, as both victim and survivor, there were still deniers and doubters. In the end he saw a younger generation emerging for whom the Holocaust is little else but facts and dates. I witnessed this myself last September during a visit to Dachau, where I saw young people taking pictures of each other in front of the crematoria and munching snacks as if they were at Disneyland, and not the site of a concentration camp where thousands of human beings had been starved, tortured and murdered.

One cannot help but be haunted by the words of Primo Levi in his last book, The Drowned and the Saved who described the fear survivors have about not being believed:

> Almost all the survivors, orally or in their written memoirs, remember a dream which frequently recurred during the nights of imprisonment, varied in its detail but uniform in its substance: they had returned home and with passion and relief were describing their past sufferings, addressing themselves to a loved one, and were not believed, indeed were not even listened to.[40]

It is the mission of HOLOCAUS to promote scholarship on the Holocaust in its purest form, free of any interference from deniers. As historians, we must serve the moral purpose of insuring that the Holocaust

---

[38]Message to Jim Mott by Greg Raven, August 15, 1995.
[39]Message to LSTOWN-L by Ingrid Shafer on August 15, 1995. Dr. Shafer sent this note to LSTOWN-L out of desperation when she couldn't reach me. Her purpose was to find out if something could be done to stop this garbage as she put it.
[40]Primo Levi The Drowned and the Saved, (Vintage, 1988), p. 12.

will not happen again to anyone, on any scale. If we don't, the truth of this event will degenerate into nothing more than facts and dates, or as the poet Jacob Glatstein succinctly put it, nothing more than "garbage for history." To conclude, the words of Glatstein:

> They'll continue to remember
> Goethe, Kant,
> Nietzsche, and Fichte.
> Heavy with philosophy,
> the Germanness of logic
> Will prettify itself again.
> Murderers and victims
> Will become together
> Garbage for history.[41]

[41] Jacob Glatstein "Verses" in I Keep Recalling: The Holocaust Poems of Jacob Glatstein , translated by Barnett Zumoff (Ktav, 1993), pp. 152,154.

APPENDIX A

Holocaus Application Form

Delighted to hear you are interested in HOLOCAUS!

HOLOCAUS is one of the H-Net family of humanities lists published by the History Department at the University of Illinois-Chicago; all together our over 70 lists have 30,000+ subscribers in 60 countries. HOLOCAUS is a daily Internet discussion forum which focuses on the history of the Holocaust and closely related topics like antisemitism, Jewish history in the 1930s and 1940s, and on closely related themes in the history of World War II, Germany and international diplomacy.

HOLOCAUS is edited by Jim Mott (SPSS Inc), Richard Levy (U of Illinois, Chicago) and Robert Michael (U of Massachusetts, Dartmouth). Each message is read by an editor before being distributed to the list. In addition, HOLOCAUS maintains an archive of files of interest to Holocaust scholars, including syllabi from Holocaust courses, bibliographic lists, announcements of upcoming conferences and logfiles of previous HOLOCAUS messages which subscribers can easily search according to subject. New subscribers will quickly discover that these files contain a wealth of information on how to teach about the Holocaust, ideas on films, and on many different research topics.

HOLOCAUS has over 700 subscribers from around the world; The list is primarily, though not exclusively aimed at an academic audience (professors, librarians, graduate students). We are particularly interested in reaching those who already have or plan to teach courses on the Holocaust.

If HOLOCAUS is in the range of your scholarly interests, please REPLY to me and include the following information:

Thanks!

Jim Mott
Holocaus Moderator
jimmott@spss.com

----------cut here----------

Date:
Name:
School (with academic status):
Department:
Organizational affiliation (if not a school):
Email Address:
Description of research:
Scholarly publications (if any):
Have you ever taught a course on the Holocaust?
Topics you would like discussed on HOLOCAUS:
New book in the field that you would like to see reviewed:
How did you hear about HOLOCAUS?